10 Appeal from a judgment of the United States District Court for the 11 Northern District of New York (Glenn T. Suddaby, Chief Judge).

12 UPON DUE CONSIDERATION, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED, ADJUDGED,
13 AND DECREED that the judgment of the District Court is AFFIRMED.

14 William Morrison appeals from a judgment of the District Court (Suddaby, 15 C.J.) imposing a sentence of 36 months' imprisonment following his guilty plea
16 to violating the terms of his supervised release. On appeal, Morrison challenges 17 his sentence as procedurally and substantively unreasonable and contends that 18 the eighteen-month delay before his final revocation hearing violated his rights 19 under the Due Process Clause and Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 32.1. We 20 assume the parties' familiarity with the underlying facts and prior record of proceedings, to which we refer only as necessary to explain our decision to affirm.

1. Reasonableness of the Sentence

We review a district court's sentencing decision for procedural and substantive reasonableness "under a deferential abuse-of-discretion standard." United States v. Cavera, 550 F.3d 180, 189 (2d Cir. 2008) (en banc) (quotation marks omitted).

Morrison argues that his sentence is procedurally unreasonable because the District Court failed to adequately justify its imposition of a sentence outside the advisory Guidelines range. We disagree. A sentencing court makes a procedural error if it bases a sentence on a "mistake in its Guidelines calculation," "does not consider the [18 U.S.C.] § 3553(a) factors," "rests its sentence on a clearly erroneous finding of fact," or "fails adequately to explain its chosen sentence," including "any deviation from the Guidelines range." Id. (quotation marks omitted). "Where, as here, a defendant does not object at sentencing to a district court's failure to explain its reasoning, we review the procedural challenge for plain error." United States v. Smith, 949 F.3d 60, 66 (2d

1 Cir. 2020). Here, the District Court adequately articulated its reasons for 2 imposing the above-Guidelines sentence, focusing on Morrison’s “deceitful, 3 dangerous, and alarming behavior,” which included lying to his probation 4 officer, participating in a cocaine trafficking conspiracy, and possessing a loaded
5 firearm that put the public at risk. App’x 56–57. The District Court did not 6 commit procedural error, let alone plain error, warranting resentencing.

7 Morrison next contends that his above-Guidelines sentence is 8 substantively unreasonable because the Guidelines adequately accounted for his 9 conduct and criminal history. We are not persuaded.

10 A sentence is substantively unreasonable if it “cannot be located within the 11 range of permissible decisions.” Cavera, 550 F.3d at 189 (quotation marks 12 omitted). We consider the “totality of the circumstances, giving due deference to 13 the sentencing judge’s exercise of discretion, and bearing in mind the 14 institutional advantages of district courts.” Id. at 190. At the revocation hearing, 15 Morrison admitted to four violations of his conditions of supervised release, 16 including participation in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine in violation of 17 federal law, criminal possession of a loaded firearm in violation of state law,

1 leaving the judicial district without permission, and consuming alcohol. App'x
2 48–50. The District Court expressed particular concern about Morrison's
3 deception and "high-risk activities" that "put[] many lives at risk." App'x 56–57.
4 And after the District Court responded to Morrison's earlier supervised release 5 infractions with sanctions short of imprisonment, Morrison's behavior had "just 6 got[ten] worse." App'x 55. Under these circumstances, we cannot conclude that 7 the sentence imposed was "so shockingly high . . . or otherwise unsupportable as 8 a matter of law" as to be substantively unreasonable. United States v.
9 Broxmeyer, 699 F.3d 265, 289 (2d Cir. 2012) (quotation marks omitted).

10 2. Eighteen-Month Delay

11 Morrison also contends that the eighteen-month delay between the filing
12 of the Government's original revocation petition and his revocation hearing 13 violated his rights to due process and to a reasonably prompt revocation hearing.

14 Due process requires that a person accused of violating the conditions of 15 supervised release receive a revocation hearing "within a reasonable time after 16 [the person] is taken into custody." Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 488 (1972); 17 see United States v. Sanchez, 225 F.3d 172, 175 (2d Cir. 2000). Federal Rule of

1 Criminal Procedure 32.1(b)(2) similarly provides that “[u]nless waived by the 2 [releasee], the court must hold the revocation hearing within a reasonable time.”
3 In addition to showing that the delay was unreasonable, Morrison must establish 4 prejudice—that is, that the delay “substantially limit[ed]” his “ability to defend 5 against” the charged violations. United States v. Ramos, 401 F.3d 111, 116
6 (2d Cir. 2005).

7 We need not address the reasonableness of the delay—which was caused 8 primarily by Morrison’s repeated requests for adjournments—because Morrison
9 has not established that he suffered any prejudice from the delay. Upon review
10 of the record, we do not see how an earlier hearing would have helped Morrison
11 reduce his time in custody. To the contrary, Morrison appears to have benefitted 12 from the repeated delays, which allowed him to obtain new counsel and resolve 13 other pending charges before admitting to the underlying conduct at his 14 revocation hearing. We therefore reject Morrison’s argument that the delay 15 violated his constitutional or statutory rights.

1 We have considered Morrison's remaining arguments and conclude that 2 they are without merit. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the District
3 Court is AFFIRMED.
